NOTEBOOK

CHOC-FULL OF LOVE

A 40-year-old woman with a 10-year history of rheumatoid arthritis (RA) treated with chronic low-dose prednisone (5 mg daily) and intermittent low-dose intravenous (IV) cyclophosphamide (1.5 g/m² monthly) for 10 years. She had no other chronic medical conditions and was on no other medications. She presented with a 2-week history of

There are several reasons why the estimated treatment effect might be biased. First, the study might have been subject to selection bias. For example, the study might have included only patients who were most likely to respond to treatment, or the study might have included only patients who were most likely to be in the control group. Second, the study might have been subject to measurement bias. For example, the study might have used a biased method to measure the outcome, or the study might have used a biased method to measure the treatment effect. Third, the study might have been subject to confounding bias. For example, the study might have included patients who were also receiving other treatments, or the study might have included patients who had other health conditions that could affect the outcome.
